A Two-Year Healing Journey

So one of my biggest cases close to my heart, one I feel like one my of biggest wins is this two-year-old child that I've been working with. And it's a big place in my hear because it has been two years in the making.

I have seen her since day one. The reason for that is she was born in a situation where she had been addicted to several different types of substances.

And we knew that this was going to be a long road.

Growth and Development Milestones

So her mom was the adoptive custody at the time, and she's like, we really need to get her some help. And as we progressed working through her, she wasn't making birth weight.

She wasn' growing. You know, you saw a lot of kind of slack in the development. So, well, the big thing is she's grown immense amounts and she is actually in a percentile now.

So with the nutrition and the program we've helped her get to that healthy weight. But the biggest thing, biggest milestone, and most recent one that we busted down is her need for occupational therapy.

Occupational Therapy Breakthrough

She had been seen in OT for, again, some of these milestone markers, you know, very fine motor type things that they just weren't quite seen where she should be at from a developmental standpoint.

So we got to a point where we had a level of agreement where I decided, let's try some of these like detox baths. Let's some other types of things to really ramp up this healing process.

So after just one treatment of this, she texted me the next day and was saying, this isn't coincidence, it has to be what we're doing. She's starting to do things that she hasn't been able to.

And she goes, and it's only been a week. So she actually came to see me the week after, she brought these things and she was, see what she's doing? These things, this wasn't happening last week, And She goes it is not a coincidence.

I know what this is, This is helping. and I am forever grateful for what you are doing for my child.
